VILLANOVA UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW

Villanova Law School was founded in 1953 to meet the need for a law school associated with a Roman Catholic university in the Philadelphia area. Shortly after graduation of its first class, Villanova received full accreditation from the American Bar Association, and was accepted into membership by the Association of American Law Schools. In 1962, Villanova became the first law school attached to a church related university to be awarded a chapter of the Order of the Coif, a selective law school honor society. The school now has well over 2500 graduates located in thirty states, the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, Canada, and other foreign countries.

With a student body of approximately 630 men and women, Villanova is large enough to offer a wide diversity of course offerings yet small enough to maintain a ratio of approximately 26 students to each faculty member. A significant number of older students bring an enriching perspective to classrooms and student activities. The number of women entering the law school has increased over the past few years, and women now comprise more than 35 percent of the entering class.
