

Working Paper Series

Villanova University Charles Widger School of Law

Year 2008

A Response to Professor Camp: The Importance of Oversight

Leslie Book
1567, book@law.villanova.edu

This paper is posted at Villanova University Charles Widger School of Law Digital Repository.
<http://digitalcommons.law.villanova.edu/wps/art122>

A RESPONSE TO PROFESSOR CAMP:¹ THE IMPORTANCE OF OVERSIGHT

LESLIE BOOK

I. INTRODUCTION

Professor Camp's article is a welcome addition to the growing scholarship addressing tax procedure generally,² and issues revolving around tax collection in particular.³ Revolving around the useful paradigm of can't versus won't pay as the critical focal point of the collection process, Professor Camp believes Collection Due Process (CDP) to be a failure. The essential insight of Professor Camp's work, both here, and in prior articles,⁴ is its highlighting that the IRS makes millions of collection determinations, many essentially automated and devoid of human touch. IRS collection efforts focus on separating those taxpayers who can't pay their liabilities due to hardship, from those who simply won't, due to procrastination or the decision to favor other creditors or purchase non-essential goods and services, instead of fulfilling their obligations to the fisc. In doing so, Camp skillfully places IRS collection actions within the magnitude of the largely automated tax collection process. He argues that CDP's notice requirements, its giving taxpayers a statutorily-created administrative hearing

¹ Bryan Camp, The Problem of Adversarial Process in the Administrative State, 83 IND. L. J. ### (2008) [hereinafter Camp, Adversarial Process]. The author is grateful for the tireless and enthusiastic assistance of John Brian Hudson (VLS 2010), and the financial support of the Villanova University School of Law.

² See, e.g., Leandra Lederman, "Civil"izing Tax Procedure: Applying General Federal Learning to Statutory Notices of Deficiency, 30 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 183 (1996); Danshera Cords, Administrative Law and Judicial Review of Tax Collection Decisions, 52 ST. LOUIS UNIV. L.J. 429 (2008); Diane L. Fahey, The Tax Court's Jurisdiction Over Due Process Collection Appeals: Is it Constitutional?, 55 BAYLOR L. REV. 453 (2003).

³ See, e.g., Bryan T. Camp, Tax Administration as Inquisitorial Process and the Partial Paradigm Shift in the IRS Restructuring and Reform Act of 1998, 56 FLA. L. REV. 1 (2004) [hereinafter Camp, Inquisitorial Process]; Steve R. Johnson, Why Craft Isn't Scary, 37 REAL PROP. PROB. & TR. J. 439 (2002); Christopher Pietruszkiewicz, Of Summonses, Required Records and Artificial Entities: Liberating the IRS From Itself, 73 MISS. L.J. 921 (2004).

⁴ See, e.g., Camp, Inquisitorial Process, supra note 2; Bryan Camp, The Failure of Collection Due Process, Part 1: The Collection Context, 104 TAX NOTES 969 (2004); Bryan Camp, The Failure of Collection Due Process, Part 2: Why it Adds No Value, 104 TAX NOTES 1567 (2004); Bryan Camp, Replacing CDP, 107 TAX NOTES 1039 (2005).

rights and its interjecting the possibility of judicial review for a broad range of collection determinations is not helpful for taxpayers or tax administration, especially in light of the bulk process that characterizes much of the IRS's task in tax collection.

While much of Professor Camp's argument is persuasive, it comes up short both as a descriptive and prescriptive model. Unquestionably, the IRS's collection process borrows heavily from inquisitorial models of agency action, and given the information asymmetry between the IRS and taxpayers themselves, the agency faces heavy obstacles to consider whether delinquent taxpayers fall within the can't- or won't-pay category. But those insights are not sufficient to explain the dynamics of the entire collection process, which is best thought of as involving a range of interests meriting differing levels of procedural protection and personal IRS intervention. In this brief response, I situate IRS collection determinations within the broader landscape of administrative law, highlight the principles that administrative law scholars have emphasized in considering what is fair agency practice, and apply those principles to the collection context. I conclude that Professor Camp rightfully highlights some of CDP's problems, but misses its benefits and thus fails in prescribing the repeal of CDP. Yet, Professor Camp's article is a significant achievement for those considering tax collection. Its targeting of CDP's shortfalls highlights some of the problems of the legislative process, and allows us to consider how Congress and the IRS can improve collection rights without sacrificing essential efficiency concerns associated with collecting taxes.

II. THE CONNECTION TO ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

Most IRS collection actions – even automatic decisions to send correspondence in light of assessed liabilities – are informal adjudications in administrative law parlance.⁵ The Administrative Procedure Act⁶ (APA) only provides for defined procedural protections for formal adjudication.⁷ Administrative agencies perform two basic functions: adjudication and rulemaking. Though intended to have “distinct procedural consequences,” the APA does not clearly distinguish the two through their respective definitions. When performing their adjudicatory role, the agency is making determinations in “administering a program made up of general rules – statutory, judicial, or administrative” – essentially applying rules to individual circumstances.⁸ In performing this adjudicatory role, the agency engages in both formal adjudications – where procedural protections apply – and informal adjudications – where protections do not.⁹ Formal adjudications are those matters where the agency is required to keep a record, and the term “informal adjudication” is sort of a catch-all for everything else.¹⁰ This situates IRS collection actions, such as sending notices, the ministerial act of assessing the liability as adjudications in administrative law parlance. As Professor Morrison has identified, “every agency action, including such mundane matters as granting, or denying, a pass to enter a government building, [or] ordering a carton of ⁵ Gordon Young, 10 ADMIN. L.J. AM. U. 179, 184 (1996) (“The APA’s differentiation between adjudicative and legislative [rulemaking] action has proved intelligible only by means of reading common sense and constitutional tradition into the statute.”). In essence, the rulemaking role that administrative agencies play is similar to a legislative body, promulgating rules, procedures, and standards applicable to both the agency and those it regulates. Charles H. Koch, Jr., Judicial Review of Administrative Discretion, 54 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 469, 483-87 (2000). Though not using the term, the only section of the APA applicable to informal adjudications is “Ancillary Matters.” 5 U.S.C. § 555 (2000).

⁶ Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 551-559, 701-706 (2000).

⁷ The only section of the APA that at all applies to informal adjudications is “Ancillary Matters.” 5 U.S.C. § 555 (2000).

⁸ Koch, supra note 5, at 471-72.

⁹ Allan B. Morrison, Administrative Agencies Are Just Like Legislatures and Courts – Except When They’re Not, 59 ADMIN. L. REV. 79, 98 (2007).

¹⁰ Id.

toilet paper . . . culminates in an “order” under the APA, the proceeding leading to it is an adjudication.”¹¹

Merely placing IRS actions within the landscape of broader administrative law, or the APA itself, does not in and of itself provide policymakers with sufficient guidance regarding how much procedural protection should attach to various stages of the IRS’s collection process.¹² The APA prescribes procedural protections only for formal adjudications, and affords no such protections for informal adjudications. Administrative law scholars have bemoaned the black hole associated with procedural protections that should attach to these, and a recent ABA report by Professor Michael Asimow¹³ proposes minimum procedural protections for this range of agency actions.

There is significant disagreement among administrative law scholars as to the extent of procedural protections, and type of actions which generate meaningful procedural protections. The task of considering whether and to what extent agency

¹¹ Id.

¹² Administrative law scholars have bemoaned how informal adjudications fall within the black hole of administrative law. The APA provides little in the way of guidance as to how the agency should conduct these adjudications, and the Supreme Court, in Vermont Yankee, declined to impose judicially imposed minimum procedural decisions for informal agency action. Vt. Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. Natural Res. Def. Council, Inc., 435 U.S. 519, 548 (1978) (“In short, nothing in the APA, NEPA, the circumstances of this case, the nature of the issues being considered, past agency practice, or the statutory mandate under which the Commission operates permit[s] the court to review and overturn the rulemaking proceeding on the basis of the procedural devices employed (or not employed) by the Commission so long as the Commission employed the statutory minima, a matter about which there is no doubt in this case.”). See also Ronald M. Levin, Understanding Unreviewability in Administrative Law, 74 MINN. L. REV. 689, 742 (1990).

¹³ See Michael Asimow, The Spreading Umbrella: Extending the APA’s Adjudication Provisions to All Evidentiary Hearings Required By Statute, 56 ADMIN. L. REV. 1003 (2004). Asimow’s piece was part of an entire symposium in the Administrative Law Review on what to do with informal adjudications. See e.g. Ronald J. Krotoszynski, Jr., Taming the Tail that Wags the Dog: Ex Post and Ex Ante Constraints on Informal Adjudication, 56 ADMIN. L. REV. 1057 (2004). Professor Krotoszynski is skeptical of the ex ante effects that judicial review has on agency practice. Id. at 1073 (“[E]stablishing a broader, generally applicable set of procedures that would open up virtually all agency decisionmaking to interested persons would probably create more problems than it would solve. A broader, generalized right of participation in all informal adjudications would be impractical, unnecessary, and unjustified on cost-benefit grounds.”) Cooley R. Howarth, Jr., Restoring the Applicability of the APA’s Adjudicatory Procedures, 56 ADMIN. L. REV. 1043 (2004).

actions generate protections is helped by situating the agency's actions within the underlying principles of administrative law. As I have previously discussed, administrative law is defined, in part, by two often inconsistent principles: efficiency and fidelity to rule of law principles.¹⁴ Concern with efficiency reflects a desire to allow agencies to use their expertise,¹⁵ and is highlighted by the broadest possible deference to agency decisions, and even their possible exclusion from judicial review.¹⁶ On the other hand, there is a longstanding concern that agencies, with too much power and acting outside the possibility of court review, can improperly disregard individual interest. This latter concern has prompted deep-seated presumptions in favor of judicial review of particularized agency decisions that affect individual's property or liberty interests.¹⁷ The presumption of judicial review of agency action is an integral part of the American checks and balances system—a powerful deterrent to abuses of power and an effective remedy when abuses occur. By helping maintain public confidence that government officials remain subject to the rule of law, judicial review also bolsters the legitimacy of agency action. . . . Finally,

¹⁴ See Leslie Book, The Collection Due Process Rights: A Misstep or a Step in the Right Direction?, 41 HOUS. L. REV. 1145 (2004) [hereinafter Book, CDP Rights] (discussing the “competing policy concerns” of efficiency and preservation of the rule of law in administrative decision-making); Leslie Book, CDP and Collections: Perceptions and Misperceptions, TAX NOTES, April 25, 2005, LEXIS, 2005 TNT 79-42.

¹⁵ Book, CDP Rights, supra note 14, at 1167; Koch, supra note 5 at 473 (“Restrained judicial review protects the courts from the burden of actively supervising the mass of individualizing decisions and protects the agencies, which would find it difficult to administer these programs if their individual decisions were frequently subjected to close judicial scrutiny.”).

¹⁶ See Book, CDP Rights, supra note 14, at 1173-75 (discussing tax litigation's place outside the administrative law mainstream in terms of judicial review of agency action); Koch, supra note 5, at 478 (“Whether a particular exercise of individualizing discretion warrants direct judicial involvement is a difficult threshold choice for a court. In deciding to review a specific individualizing decision, courts should not be criticized as long as they are highly selective in choosing to do so.” (emphasis supplied)).

¹⁷ Sidney A. Shapiro & Richard E. Levy, Government Benefits and the Rule of Law: Toward a Standards-Based Theory of Judicial Review, 58 ADMIN. L. REV. 499, 501 (2005) (“[W]henver government officials make decisions involving the application of legal standards, the rule of law – and hence the rule of law safeguards of due process and judicial review – attaches.”); Koch supra note 5, at 493 (“The threshold question for the court is always whether the agency correctly applied the law. Courts are the final arbiters of questions of law, and hence their review of this threshold question demands that they agree with the legal conclusions of the agency. They can substitute their judgment for a legal conclusion with which they disagree.”).

judicial review can enhance the quality of administrative action by exposing partiality, carelessness, and perverseness in agencies' reasoning.¹⁸

These principles are helpful guideposts, but calibrating the extent of procedural protections for the broad category of informal agency adjudications has been a challenge to administrative law scholars. In surveying the administrative law landscape where agency adjudications escaped review, Professor Koch emphasizes that there should be a strong preference against unbridled agency discretion, and advises that unreviewability should generally be limited to issues of expediency.¹⁹ In effect, Professor Camp's arguments revolve around expediency and efficiency, and are based on both a notion that CDP's protections are at best minimally beneficial to taxpayers, and cause the IRS to less efficiently manage its millions of delinquent collection accounts. To that end, Professor Camp skillfully describes how CDP allows for determinations in only the loosest sense of the word. These determinations involve little human interaction, and Professor Camp's article sets out nicely how the automated aspects of most of the tax collection process affords little discretion or judgment.²⁰ He makes a strong case for the futility of interposing judicial review for much of the collection process, especially given the sheer number of collection accounts in an annual period.

Again, considering the IRS as an administrative agency that is part of a broader administrative law landscape is helpful in gauging how much procedural protection should attach throughout the collection process. Professor Koch discusses individualized discretion as a concept surrounding the actions that agencies make when administering a program that is made up of statutory, regulatory, or administrative rules.²¹ Professor Verkuil advises that fairness, efficiency and satisfaction are the hallmarks of a fundamentally fair administrative process.²² As Professor Krotoszynski observes, these values should help shape agency practice.²³ While mundane agency decisions – like how high an agency should set its thermometer in agency office buildings²⁴ -- constitutes informal agency adjudication in the technical sense, few would worry about setting process rights revolving around this type of agency determination. Professor Camp’s arguments borrow heavily from the insights of Judge Friendly, who rightly emphasized the costs associated with imparting judicial review of individualized mass justice systems.²⁵ Yet the types of agency decisions that warrant greater concern with levels of procedural protections include cases that involve an “individual, concrete, and particularized interest.”²⁶ As Professor Davis emphasized, judicial review is an appropriate avenue to keep an individual from being exposed to the “uncontrolled and arbitrary action of a public administrative officer.”²⁷

¹⁸ Levin, supra note 12, at 742 (footnotes omitted).

¹⁹ Koch, supra note 5, at 502 (“[T]here is very little good about unbridled discretion – it is at best a necessary evil brought about by such expediencies as the need to end the process or save resources for more important decisions. Therefore, the law should incorporate a very strong preference against its proliferation. . .”).

²⁰ See Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1, at 17-24.

It is useful to think of agency decisions in general and IRS decisions in particular as arising on a spectrum, with decisions that reflect a greater need for fidelity to efficiency and expediency on one end and those with a greater need for fairness and satisfaction that generally are associated with heightened procedural safeguards on the ²¹ Koch, supra note 5, at 471-72.

²² Paul R. Verkuil, The Emerging Concept of Administrative Procedure, 78 COLUM. L. REV. 258, 279-80 (1978).

²³ Krotoszynski, supra note 13, at 1071.

²⁴ Id. at 1072.

²⁵ Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1, at 49. See generally Henry Friendly, Some Kind of Hearing, 123 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1267 (1967).

²⁶ Krotoszynski, supra note 13, at 1073. See also Richard E. Levy & Sidney A Shapiro, Government Benefits and the Rule of Law: Toward a Standards-Based Theory of Judicial Review, 58 Admin. L. Rev. 499 (2006) (urging that judicial review is appropriate in cases concerning government benefits).

²⁷ See KENNETH CULP DAVIS, 2 ADMINISTRATIVE LAW TREATISE § 28:1, 28:7 (2d ed. 1984).

other.²⁸ Just where agency decisions fall on this spectrum evolves over time, as individuals' expectations of procedural regularity have increased over the last century.²⁹ For example, the substantial pre-assessment administrative and judicial review rights that taxpayers now enjoy were not part of the income tax system as originally proposed,³⁰ and the tax system's increasing emphasis on increased individual rights mirrors society's generalized expectations for additional procedural protections in light of government actions that could affect individuals' property rights.

Professor Camp argues that CDP gives additional procedural rights at a point in time where many individuals do not necessarily raise, or are incapable of raising, particularized individual interests. Pointing to the bulk processing aspect of collection, and the millions of annual collection notices that trigger CDP review, Camp questions how CDP adds value to collection decisions that largely revolve around the government's legitimate task of ferreting out the can't- from the won't-pays.³¹

Yet the argument that CDP is over inclusive misses the particularized interests that individuals have in the collection process. For example, IRS decisions with respect to

²⁸ See Lawrence Solum, Procedural Justice, 78 S. CAL. L. REV. 181, 264 (2004) ("The satisfaction interpretation of the participation model uses participant satisfaction as the criteria for the evaluation of process."); R. Tyler, What is Procedural Justice?: Criteria Used by Citizens to Assess the Fairness of Legal Procedures, 22 LAW & SOC'Y REV. 103 (1988) (citing the opportunity for error correction as an essential factor in citizen satisfaction with procedures).

²⁹ See LAWRENCE M. FRIEDMAN, TOTAL JUSTICE 80-91 (1985) (arguing that Americans increasingly expect all government actions that affect individuals to conform to notions of fair procedure).

³⁰ Before CDP, the IRS could automatically place a lien on all of the taxpayer's property or rights to property following nonpayment or a deficiency determination. If the taxpayer then refuses to pay the tax liability, the IRS could use their levy power – a provisional remedy, as it does not determine whether or not the taxpayer actually owes the underlying liability or whether a third party has a superior interest to the property – to collect, allowing the government the right to seize and dispose of property before such a determination is made. However, now when a lien is placed on a taxpayer's property, they are entitled to notice and have the right for a CDP hearing before any action may be taken. For a discussion of the changes made to the income tax system with the advent of CDP, see Book, CDP Rights, supra note 14, at 1150-56.

³¹ Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1, at 67 ("The dynamic nature of the classification decisions and the high-volume automated nature of the collection process are perhaps the most important reasons why adversarial judicial review adds no value to this branch of tax administration.").

collection alternatives raise individual particularized taxpayer interests. As Professor Camp describes, the three main collection alternatives are: (1) Installment Agreements, where the taxpayer pays the liability in full plus interest over time; (2) Offers-in-Compromise (OICs), where the IRS absolves a taxpayer of a certain portion of the liability, and the taxpayer pays back an agreed-upon amount at once or over time; and (3) Currently-Not-Collectible (CNC) status, where the tax debt remains, but the IRS agrees to hold off collection action.³² CDP has created a hybrid world for collection alternatives. Generally, IRS determinations about collection alternatives are and have been exempt from court review. CDP changed that in one important respect: if a taxpayer raises a collection alternative in a CDP hearing, the agency determination is subject to abuse of discretion review based upon the record created in the Appeals CDP hearing.³³ So CDP has opened the door, albeit slightly, for judicial review of these determinations – but only if the taxpayer raises the collection alternative in the CDP hearing – and court review is generally limited to consideration of whether the IRS abused its discretion based upon the record before it when it made its decision.

One of Professor Camp’s main criticisms of judicial review of collection determinations is that the collection process is dynamic, dependent upon the taxpayer’s ever changing financial circumstances.³⁴ But this is not true as a descriptive matter with respect to collection alternatives in general and offers in compromise in particular. Rather than a dynamic event, the IRS is required to consider a taxpayer’s request for a collection alternative based upon the taxpayer’s facts when he submits those to the IRS. Consider offers in compromise based upon doubt as to collectability. In those offers, the IRS is authorized to accept an offer to settle an outstanding tax liability, and the IRS generally accepts offers if the taxpayer's offer amount equals or exceeds his reasonable collection potential (RCP).³⁵ RCP is based upon a consideration of equity in assets and a monetized present value of the excess of the taxpayer's income over necessary expenses.³⁶ The IRS evaluates these offers based upon a snapshot of the taxpayer's financial condition. To take into account a possible future change in circumstances, the IRS is authorized to enter into collateral agreements that can result in future payments to the IRS.³⁷ Absent a collateral agreement, and assuming the taxpayer remains in compliance for a period after the offer's acceptance,³⁸ the taxpayer's future circumstances are irrelevant insofar as the offer.³⁹

³² Id. at 13.

³³ When the underlying tax liability is at issue, the IRS’s determination will be reviewed de novo. However, when the underlying tax liability is not at issue, the Tax Court will review the IRS’s determination on an abuse of discretion basis. Goza v. Comm’r, 114 T.C. 176, 181-82 (2000).

³⁴ See Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1, at 67-72.

While a taxpayer may submit future requests for collection alternatives if an initial request is denied or not processed, that future right does not alter the nature of the IRS's function with respect to the initial consideration. Over time, Congress has expressed a strong interest in formalizing the offer process, and effectively required the IRS to apply its detailed standards to the taxpayer's facts and circumstances. To fit in consideration of offers into his bulk processing model, Professor Camp minimizes the

³⁵ See 26 C.F.R. § 601.203 (2008).

³⁶ See I.R.M. 5.8.5.

³⁷ A collateral agreement enables the government to collect funds in addition to the amount actually secured by the offer or to add additional terms not included in the standard Form 656 agreement, thereby recouping part or all of the difference between the amount of the offer or additional terms of the offer and the liability compromised. I.R.M. 5.8.6.1.

³⁸ A taxpayer who has had an OIC accepted must remain in compliance with federal tax filing and payment requirements for five years or the duration of the OIC, whichever is longer. I.R.M. 5.19.7.3.26.5(1) (Dec. 5, 2006).

³⁹ This works to the advantage of some taxpayers, who may have improved their financial circumstances following either submission or acceptance of the offer, but in other situations, works to the IRS's advantage, as in some situations the taxpayer's RCP declines.

individual application of standards to taxpayers' circumstances in offers.⁴⁰ While the IRS has promulgated standards and caps to help the IRS (and taxpayers) compute collection potential, with the exception of an allowance for expenses associated with food, clothing and some miscellaneous items, some of the expenses must be tied to actual expenditures.⁴¹ Moreover, Congress emphasized the individualized nature of offer determinations,⁴² and in RRA 98 Congress formalized some of the rules with respect to offers.⁴³ In addition, Congress also provided that the IRS is not allowed to reject an offer from a low-income taxpayer just because the offer amount is low.⁴⁴ IRS and Treasury expanded upon this statutory right, providing that this no minimum offer rule applies to all taxpayers – not just low income taxpayers.⁴⁵

Of course, the IRS is free to administer programs like collection alternatives in a manner that it deems appropriate. In fact, following RRA 98, the IRS has taken many steps to make the offer process more efficient, including creating a centralized review

⁴⁰ See Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1, at 25 (characterizing evaluation criteria for OICs as “aggregate” or “bulk” as opposed to individualized).

⁴¹ “Taxpayers are allowed the total National Standards amount monthly for their family size, without questioning the amounts they actually spend. If the amount claimed is more than the total allowed by the National Standards, the taxpayer must provide documentation to substantiate those expenses are necessary living expenses. Generally, the total number of persons allowed for National Standards should be the same as those allowed as exemptions on the taxpayer’s most recent year income tax return.” Internal Revenue Serv., National Standards: Food, Clothing and Other Items, <http://www.irs.gov/businesses/small/article/0,,id=104627,00.html>. The IRS also allows taxpayers a minimum amount of health care expenses regardless of actual expenses, but allowable transportation and housing expenses are based on actual expenditures, which must be documented and are subject to limitations based on family size and location. See Internal Revenue Serv., Collection Financial Standards, <http://www.irs.gov/individuals/article/0,,id=96543,00.html>.

⁴² S. Rep. No. 105-174, at 89 (1998) (“The IRS will also be required to consider the facts and circumstances of a particular taxpayer’s case in determining whether the national and local schedules are adequate for that particular taxpayer. If the facts indicate that use of scheduled allowances would be inadequate under the circumstances, the taxpayer would not be limited by the national or local allowances.”).

⁴³ IRS Restructuring and Reform Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105-174, § 509 (1998).

⁴⁴ S. Rep. No. 105-174, at 89 (1998). This latter change reflects Congressional desire to consider the individualized circumstances of offers, and again highlights the need for individualized determinations that reflect agency creation of applicable standards and agency application of those standards to individuals in a manner inconsistent with the bulk processing nature of the collection stream that Professor Camp describes.

⁴⁵ Treas. Reg. § 301.7122-1(f)(3) (2002).

process for offers and removing most offer requests from field consideration.⁴⁶ These steps are reflective of the agency's deep-seated concern for efficiency and expediency when it comes to actions, a concern with even greater pedigree when it comes to tax collection.

This statutory requirement that the IRS not reject offers solely on the amount of the offer reflects Congressional concern that prior to RRA 98 the IRS was not considering the individual merits of particular offers,⁴⁷ and is an explicit rejection of the broad discretionless approach to tax collection that Professor Camp describes. It is not that Professor Camp's description is wrong; it is just incomplete. While much of the collection process does not rely in any way on individualized determinations, by their definition, collection alternatives, and offers in compromise in particular, require that the IRS consider the circumstances of the taxpayer submitting the requests for alternatives to enforced collection, and apply standards to those individualized circumstances. It is of course possible for either Congress to legislate or the IRS to administer the law to remove discretion from the consideration—in fact, both have done so when it comes to certain installment agreement requests, where taxpayers in effect have an automatic right to agree to pay those agreements in certain defined circumstances.⁴⁸

⁴⁶ See Gov't Accountability Office, IRS Offers in Compromise: Performance Has Been Mixed; Better Management Information and Simplification Could Improve the Program 7 (April, 2006) (describing the centralization of OIC review); 2007 Nat'l Taxpayer Advocate Annual Report to Con. 376-81 (arguing that the new OIC rules may actually be making it harder for taxpayers to submit OICs).

⁴⁷ See S. Rep. No. 105-174, at 88-89 (discussing the desire for the IRS to be flexible in dealing with taxpayers who are trying to meet their obligations and requiring the IRS to take into account the taxpayer's facts and circumstances when deciding whether to accept an OIC).

⁴⁸ For tax liabilities under $10,000, the IRS will automatically accept an installment agreement. I.R.M. 5.14.1.2(5). The IRS is also required to accept installment agreements from taxpayers who are unable to pay their tax liability in full, the agreement will result in full payment within three years, and the taxpayer has not entered into another installment agreement or failed to file tax returns or pay taxes on those returns in the last five years. See I.R.C. § 6159(c).

Now, as might be expected in a program that may cost the agency significant resources, and where future benefits of agreeing to not take enforced collection may be difficult to gauge, the IRS has done its best following RRA 98 to centralize offer submissions and considerations in an effort to limit the costs associated with agency discretion. At the same time, the IRS has promulgated extensive guidance to assist both itself and taxpayers both with respect to the process of submitting offers and the fairly complex task of determining a taxpayer's collection potential.⁴⁹

Professor Camp implicitly acknowledges the difference between the IRS's considerations of alternatives to enforced collection from the rest of the collection process by noting that even where the IRS does have to make individualized determinations, its incentives are toward reaching correct decisions. Professor Camp describes how incentives, absent CDP, provide more than sufficient means of checking potential IRS abuses and errors:

On the one hand, if the definition of can't-pay is too narrow, then the IRS pursues taxpayers who truly cannot pay. Not only does that waste resources but it also makes the IRS look hard and mean, thereby undermining confidence in government and leaving the citizenry—and ultimately democracy—vulnerable to charlatans and demagogues. On the other hand, if the definition is too broad, the IRS looks like a chump and those who have paid their taxes wonder why the hammer never falls on similarly situated taxpayers who shirked their responsibility. Error in either direction weakens voluntary compliance, which depends in no small measure on perception.⁵⁰

Yet individualized IRS determinations about these collection alternatives constitute confidential tax return information,⁵¹ and are not subject to disclosure and are thus generally not made available to other taxpayers. It is difficult to see how the public genuinely becomes aware of IRS decisions, except only in the context of generalized perception of IRS performance.

⁴⁹ In addition to OICs based on doubt as to collectability, the IRS is authorized to accept OICs based on effective tax administration and doubt as to liability. See I.R.C. § 7122 (2000) (granting authority to set procedures to accept OICs); Treas. Reg. § 301.7122-1 (2002) (outlining those procedures).

⁵⁰ Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1, at 30.

⁵¹ See 5 U.S.C. § 552A(b) (2000).

Professor Camp also states that limited review tied to the record “undermines the promise of CDP.” Yet, a consideration of some of the recent cases where the court have remanded back to the IRS determinations with respect to collection alternatives highlights the important safety valve that CDP’s court review can play, and how in fact CDP’s limited review has served its intended oversight function of limited aspects of the collection process, has corrected for egregious agency error, and allowed for the court to highlight errors in the IRS’s consideration of collection alternatives that might have broader impact than the taxpayer whose case is on appeal. While Professor Camp discounts record review as being second best to de novo review, administrative law scholars have long pointed to the benefits of this limited review when it is important to both give the agency broad deference, but not afford the agency unbridled and absolute discretion.⁵² That taxpayers themselves control most of the information relating to their ability to pay an assessed liability tempers Professor Camp’s criticism that record review is inadequate, and belies the potential for facilitating confidence in the tax system through ensuring that government agents “remain subject to the rule of law.”⁵³

Professor Camp highlights the overwhelming percentage of cases which the courts have sustained IRS collection determinations. Apart from the fact that most agency determinations under an abuse of discretion review are likely to be sustained⁵⁴, there are a growing number of important CDP cases where the courts have found problems with the collection process.⁵⁵ Prior to CDP, these cases would never have been before the courts. Consider the case of Oman v. Commissioner.⁵⁶ Oman involves a one-time business executive who for a number of years filed tax returns with significant unpaid balances.⁵⁷ By 2004, his outstanding tax liabilities approached $170,000.⁵⁸ After completing rehabilitation to overcome substance abuse addiction, while unemployed, living with friends, and relying on gifts from family, he submitted a $1000 offer based upon doubt as to collectibility.⁵⁹ His collection information sheet that accompanied his offer indicated that he had no assets and a negative monthly cash flow; thus the $1,000 offer exceeded his RCP.⁶⁰

⁵² See Davis, supra note 27, at § 12:13 (indicating that de novo review provides little opportunity for judicial pressure on the IRS to conform to procedural requirements); Koch, supra note 5, at 491-95 (explaining the benefits of limited review for different types of discretion that the agency practices).

⁵³ Levin, supra note 12, at 742.

⁵⁴ See Paul R. Verkuil, An Outcomes Analysis of Scope of Review Standards, 44 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 679, 689 (2002) (hypothesizing an 85-90% affirmance rate for abuse of discretion review cases).

The IRS acknowledged that Oman's RCP was zero, but rejected Oman's offer because of his "egregious history of past non-compliance" and a belief that due to "current finances" it did not think he would remain in compliance during the offer's terms.⁶¹ Prior to the initial IRS rejection of the offer, the IRS filed a Notice of Federal Tax Lien, and issued a corresponding right to a collection due process hearing.⁶² Oman submitted a request for a due process hearing, and was able to use the hearing as a forum to challenge the initial IRS rejection of the offer.⁶³ At the hearing, the Appeals Office sustained the offer's rejection, and in its determination it cited to IRM 5.8.7.6(5) and held

⁵⁵ See infra note 77.

⁵⁶ T.C. Memo 2006-231 (2006).

⁵⁷ There were 8 years in total that gave rise to the liability. For the earliest year, Oman failed to file an original tax return; in four years, he filed untimely and also did not submit sufficient payment; and in the final three years, Oman filed timely but did not remit payment of the balances due. Id. at 2.

⁵⁸ Id.

⁵⁹ Id. at 3.

⁶⁰ Id.

⁶¹ Id. at 3-4.

⁶² Id. at 4.

⁶³ Id. at 6.

that due to “your egregious history of noncompliance it is in the best interest of the government not to accept your offer to compromise.”⁶⁴

The Tax Court appropriately reviewed Appeals’ rejection on a deferential basis, noting that it does not conduct an independent review of what would be an acceptable offer, but gives deference to the Commissioner’s discretion and decides whether the rejection was arbitrary, capricious or without sound basis in law.⁶⁵ Thus, Oman presented the issue as to whether and on what basis the IRS can reject offers that exceed the taxpayer’s RCP.

The Oman Court examined IRS guidance in its internal revenue manual to clarify when it might be in the government’s interest to reject an offer that exceeded what the government could reasonably expect to collect.⁶⁶ It looked to the IRS’s own policy statement on offers, IRS Policy Statement P-5-100, which provides that the goals of the offer program are (1) collecting what can fairly and reasonably be collected from taxpayers who cannot fully pay a delinquent liability, (2) collecting tax in a timely and cost-effective manner, and (3) providing an opportunity for taxpayers to earn a fresh start toward future payment and filing obligations.⁶⁷ The Policy Statement also states that the “ultimate goal is a compromise which is in the best interest of both the taxpayer and the Service.”⁶⁸

⁶⁴ Id.

⁶⁵ Id. at 9.

⁶⁶ Id. at 10-11.

⁶⁷ Id. at 13.

⁶⁸ The policy statement also provides guidance on the process of offer, noting that “in cases where an offer in compromise appears to be a viable solution to a tax delinquency, the Service employee assigned the case will discuss the compromise alternative with the taxpayer and, when necessary, assist in preparing the required forms. The taxpayer will be responsible for initiating the first specific proposal for compromise... Taxpayers are expected to provide reasonable documentation to verify their ability to pay.” This guidance reflects a sense that the IRS should both facilitate and assist in the offer process, while recognizing the

The IRS, in IRM 5.8.7.6(5), has provided that there may be instances where an offer rejection may also be based on a determination that accepting the offer at hand is not in the "best interest of the government" per policy statement P-5-100.⁶⁹ The IRM provides that these rejections "should not be routine" and should be "fully supported by the facts outlined in the rejection narrative" and subject to "additional managerial review."⁷⁰ The IRM provides examples of situations that may warrant rejection as not being in the "best interest of the government," including:

Recent compliance satisfies offer processability criteria; however, the taxpayer has an egregious history of past noncompliance and our analysis of his current finances reveals that it will be highly unlikely the taxpayer will be able to remain in compliance during the offer period.⁷¹

Thus, while the IRS's Policy Statement focuses on collecting efficiently what a taxpayer can reasonably be expected to pay and the benefits of providing a fresh start, the IRM suggests that past egregious noncompliance and the likelihood of future noncompliance can create a situation where the IRS may reject an offer in excess of RCP.

Oman concluded that these two provisions were inconsistent, noting that the Policy Statement offered nothing that suggested that past compliance or the likelihood of future compliance should affect the agency's evaluation of an offer:

IRM sec. 5.8.7.6(5) and policy statement P-5-100, as applied in this case, appear to be inconsistent regarding the "best interest of the government". IRM sec. 5.8.7.6(5) pertains to rejecting offers if they are "not in the 'best interest of the government', per policy statement P-5-100", while policy statement P-5-100 describes the dollar amount of offers which are in the "best interest" of the government and encourages such compromises. The "goal" of the offer- in-compromise program, according to policy statement P-5-100, is to collect what is potentially collectible as early as possible, and the "ultimate goal" is to find a taxpayer's responsibility for making an initial offer and providing to the IRS information sufficient to make a determination. Id. at 12.

⁶⁹ Id. at 10-11.

⁷⁰ Id. at 10-11.

⁷¹ Id. at 15-16.

compromise that is in the "best interest of both the taxpayer and the Service." Policy statement P-5-100 does not mention "egregious past non-compliance". It instead mentions "creating for the taxpayer an expectation of a fresh start toward future compliance."

According to policy statement P-5-100, it appears the "best interest of the government" is a compromise that is also in the best interest of the taxpayer and which collects the potentially collectible amount, or more, at the earliest possible time.⁷²

In light of the above, the Oman court found it difficult to justify the IRS's rejection of the offer, noting (i) that the IRS "determined that petitioner's reasonable collection potential was zero" (ii) that under the Policy Statement acceptance of the $ 1,000 offer is in the IRS's and the taxpayer's "best interest"; and (iii) that acceptance permits the IRS to collect more than it could otherwise collect and allow "a fresh start toward future compliance."⁷³

Oman illustrates the possible problems with the IRS's collection system, and how, absent CDP, those problems can lead to arbitrary determinations for taxpayers. There is something deeply dissatisfying about the IRS's approach in Oman specifically, and the guidelines which allowed the IRS to reject the offer. On the one hand, there are a number of reasons why the IRS might find it difficult to accept Oman's offer. First, the offer itself is low relative to the amount of tax that was unpaid. The $1000 offer reflects a small percentage of the unpaid tax. That, however, as described above, is an insufficient basis to reject an offer.⁷⁴

The IRS in the IRM and in Oman's itself does explicitly consider the circumstances of that past conduct and evaluate whether those circumstances warrant an exception to the general rule that the IRS should accept doubt as to collectability offers when the offer equals or exceeds RCP. Yet, there is little guidance for the IRS on this very point; the regulations are silent and the IRM provides a few examples, without any discussion of the underlying principles that should guide the IRS. In Oman, it is not clear just what about his history the IRS found egregious. Perhaps it was the combination of his relatively high income with many years of making barely any tax payments. It could have been what he apparently was doing with Uncle Sam's money, as the opinion notes that during the years where he failed to pay taxes he had substance abuse problems.⁷⁵ It could be that the liabilities relate to underpayments or nonpayments, rather than liabilities that arose on examination.⁷⁶

⁷² Id. at 13-14.

⁷³ Id. at 13-14.

⁷⁴ See supra note 44 and surrounding text.

Concepts of “best interests of the government” or “contrary to public policy” are too vague to allow a reviewing court the opportunity to determine if the IRS abused its discretion. In effect, in Oman, the IRS operated as if its discretion were absolute, and that its decision need not be rationally explained or tied to principles that provide meaningful guidance to its employees. Oman can thus be thought of as the Tax Court's proper entry into this issue, with a firm reminder that OICs, at least when challenged in the context of CDP, are subject to typical rule of law principles. The IRS cannot reject offers because they flunk a smell test, or because the taxpayer has red hair, or because of some secret IRS policy that encourages rejection of low offers. Oman lays down the marker that the IRS better clarify in either its manual or in regulations what principles underlie rejecting offers that exceed RCP, and in particular determinations, Appeals must explain specifically how the taxpayers' circumstances warrant that determination. It illustrates precisely why Congress thought collection determinations may need the benefit of judicial oversight, and fits squarely within the concerns that a number of administrative law scholars have suggested as providing a strong presumption against unbridled agency discretion.

⁷⁵ See Dissipation case, where the court

⁷⁶ For example, there is less generous opportunity for relief from joint and several liability when the liability is self-reported. IRC Section 6015.

While Professor Camp rightly points out that the overwhelming number of CDP cases result in affirmations of IRS collection actions, there are a number of recent cases, in addition to Oman, involving remands where IRS failed to apply proper legal standards.⁷⁷ Administrative law scholars have emphasized that limited record review results in comparatively few cases of court reversal of agency action. Yet, absent CDP, there is no realistic manner for taxpayers to ensure scrutiny of IRS collection actions.

Professor Camp believes this limited court review is “horrid,” and points to some examples where courts have been hamstrung by inadequate records and notes the relatively few times where courts have meaningfully disagreed with agency determinations.⁷⁸ Yet, as I have previously argued, record review is precisely the appropriate level of review when one wants to give broad deference to agency expertise, there is a strong government interest in executive agency discretion, and yet there is a need to have a means to check the agency’s absolute discretion to temper for systemic failures or egregious errors. The promise of oversight from parties other than courts provides only limited means of ensuring that IRS collection actions involve correct applications or expressions of legal principles

⁷⁷ See Sampson v. Comm’r, T.C. Summary Opinion 2006-75 (2006) (incorrect standard when calculating a taxpayer’s earning potential); Samuel v. Comm’r T.C. Memo 2007-312 (2007) (incorrect guidance given to taxpayer for amended OIC); Perkins v. Comm’r, T.C. Memo 2008-103 (2008) (erroneous interpretation of applicable law); Dailey v. Comm’r, T.C. Memo 2008-148 (2008) (incomplete consideration of an OIC). Each of these cases highlights the importance of CDP in different ways. Sampson’s application of an incorrect standard helps illustrate the point that unchecked internal review can fail to properly identify diversions from the IRS’s own guidelines – in this case the IRM. Dailey shows how external review protects taxpayers from incomplete consideration of their situation, and requires IRS officers to conduct a complete and thorough review of the appropriate factors. Similarly, Samuel identifies factors that must be taken into account when advising a taxpayer on their course of action. Perkins, though, is probably the best illustration of CDP’s effectiveness. In this case, the court was able to tackle the issue of mistaken interpretation of law – an issue typically reviewed de novo. Perkins is also a terrific example of how external review should be conducted. The court took over the legal question involved (statutory interpretation), but left to the IRS the responsibility of applying that legal determination to a particular set of facts, actually going out of its way not to step on the toes of the IRS by making its own factual determination.

⁷⁸ Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1 at 55, 57-61.

The fact that other mechanisms exist to provide oversight⁷⁹ does not suggest that court review is inappropriate. The existence of bodies such as TIGTA, GAO, and the Taxpayer Advocate Service, to name a few, are helpful mechanisms to facilitate proper agency conduct. Those executive agency checks, however, are not a substitute for independent judicial review, with judicial expertise playing a different and invaluable role.⁸⁰

Professor Camp notes that Congress might provide for individualized causes of action with respect to IRS rejections of collection alternatives.⁸¹ The number of collection alternative requests that the IRS rejects is likely considerably lower than the number of collection actions now that currently gives rise to CDP rights. This is a proposal that warrants further consideration. I note that Congress, over time, has provided circumstances where the agency is required to accept certain collection alternatives, and the IRS has in fact broadened the circumstances where it will grant that relief. This too could limit the potential agency and court resources, and correct for the oddity that only adverse collection determinations within current CDP generate possible court review.

III. CONCLUSION

⁷⁹ Camp, Adversarial Process, supra note 1, at.

⁸⁰ See supra note 1.

⁸¹ Professor Camp states that a narrowly tailored cause of action where a taxpayer can challenge the rejection of a collection alternative would “at least put an individualized decision in front of a court.” Id. at 70 n.183.

Professor Camp is one of a handful of scholars meaningfully considering the appropriate role that the IRS, courts and Congress should play in the collection process. His article highlights a number of CDP's problems. This response is not intended to belittle some of those problems, nor offer the view that CDP is perfect. Yet, Professor Camp's descriptive and prescriptive approaches I believe are incomplete. They miss the essential protections that interjecting additional procedural protections in the collection process provide. Despite its shortfalls, his article is a significant achievement and helps situate the discussion about the appropriate roles that our branches of government should play in the crucial task of collecting the revenues that are our nation's lifeblood.